PRESIDENT'S CORNER:

Architects + Construction Firms = Better Results

“When it comes to getting things done, we need fewer architects and more bricklayers.”

-Colleen C. Barrett
Corporate Secretary of Southwest Airlines

In recent years, there has been a noticeable improvement in collaboration between architects and construction firms. Relationships between the two, often adversarial, have evolved into a more positive working experience. Due to the current economy, clients naturally expect to bid projects out in order to get the best possible price. We have found that including a contractor or builder, negotiated up front, during the design process provides a more efficient and cost effective result. By requiring the contractor to have an open book policy and bidding the trades to multiple subcontractors, it still allows for a competitive and cost conscious project.

It has been encouraging to see that many contractors recognize the value that a collaborative architect can bring to a project. Our built environments can only benefit from architects and contractors working together to make our visions as designers reality and cost effective.

Do You Know the Difference Between a Builder and a Contractor?

The terms “builder” and “contractor” are not really synonymous. In this post, I’ve listed some key differences that I have observed as an architect.

Marina Bay Condominium Buildings Get a Makeover

Over the past three years, we have collaborated with residents of The Marina Bay condominiums on Longboat Key to update the exteriors of the buildings and modernize the entryways, fountains, and lobbies. In addition to improving the ambience for current condo owners, these improvements make a terrific first impression when potential new buyers of condo units first visit the property or see a unit listed for sale online. See the article in Sarasota Magazine.
