PRESIDENT'S CORNER:

The Merging of Architectural Styles

Synergy - the interaction of elements that when combined produce a total effect that is greater than the sum of the individual elements, contributions, etc.; synergism.

-Wikipedia definition of Syncretism

"A designed beauty of synergy is that it serves only to add, never subtract."

-Barb Rententbach, Synergy 2009

Merging of architectural styles is becoming more and more common. An architectural style (such as Mediterranean, Modernist, British West Indies) typically describes buildings with consistent elements such as: construction materials; roof shape and pitch; window size, shape, and placement; door shape and placement; ornamentation; and floor plans. Some styles are named for historic periods or regional influences.

Although each style is defined by a certain vernacular, every architectural style is open for reinterpretation—either on new construction or renovations. In some cases, a client's preferred architectural style must be reinterpreted due to updated building codes or aesthetic desires.

Interior design provides another opportunity to blend styles or marry the architecture to interior elements. Balancing varying furniture styles (i.e. contemporary pieces with antiques) within a particular architectural environment is a very welcome challenge for many interior designers - and seen more and more often.

The key to successfully blending architectural styles is starting with a clear understanding of the client's preferences. Listening to the client is the first task. Clients should provide photos/visuals for the architect and interior designers to review and research should be done on similar architectural and interior styles. The blending of aesthetic styles provides a creative opportunity to design a unique brand of architecture, both on the exterior and the interior.
